

Buenos Ayres! Wednesday December 1, 1852.

D. F. Sarmiento, Deputy to the National Congress of the Province of San Juan...

Yungay, Oct. 18th, 1852.

My Distinguished General— Formerly an obscure co-operator in the enterprise of organizing our Country...

Y. E. recognized in me, and which you had the condescension to mention to myself two days before the battle of Caseros...

Where at first, and I yet differ myself with the belief, that we still are agreed, as a fundamental principle, in the possible organization of the Republic...

I expressed these ideas, on one occasion I recollect in the presence of Don Elias Beldoya, now your Counsellor of State...

Recent events, and the series of oscillations that have succeeded the battle of Caseros, render once more problematical the longed for organization...

How does it happen, General, that the republic of Buenos Ayres, the General, your friend Fíero, your most faithful servant...

of publications; Leiza your former Entre Rios minister; little Huelgo, who played so at the encampment of Cabral...

What I do to three of the Buenos Ayres a federal of that Province, a General Guido, a General Pacheco, a Colonel Cosca, Lagos...

Here is the error, General; but this error was the necessary consequence of a series of preceding errors, and which I wish briefly to note in passing...

The line of committees can seldom present such a phenomenon as that exhibited by the spirit of the people in Buenos Ayres and in the Provinces...

Patriotic writers had for many years been studying the interests of the Republic, splitting the marrow of party, and forming a slow but certain reaction against the practices of the Government...

Guided by these notions of common sense, and perfectly aware of the state of public opinion, he charged the system of addressing Y. E., pointing out what we expected from your patriotism...

Well, General, in March 1851, you had arranged to visit Montevideo, and I had secured against Orribi, by the arms, clothing, ammunition and subsidies that had been prepared; you had secured moreover, by treaties with Brazil, one hundred thousand dollars per month...

These elements of triumph were what you should have made known to the Governors of the Province, a selfish race, and whose hostility should have been removed...

The battle of Monte Caseros, then, should not have taken place, for nobody, neither Rosas himself, nor his soldiers, would have resisted...

We arrive at Buenos Ayres, and the victorious General begins making the declaration—willing full of enthusiasm and gratitude...

With the exception of the few who were retained to act by reaction, the red robe of Rosas was despotism, the machoara, barbarity, humiliation, everything...

But though there may be wags who attribute the course of narrow natural course of things brings its consequences. Despite the envy's, in contravention...

lency's remark, respecting the evils about to result from that partition... I had however separated the same thing to Don Angel Rifa...

What did the General, after the ovation of the 30th February, so spontaneously so cordial, but so assuming the City of Buenos Ayres! He sat in her face...

Y. E. recollects the position I held in the streets and might have seen, as the Rosario and Palermo, the estimation in which I was held...

That measure, apparently insignificant, was interpreted by popular instinct, in its true character...

The Provinces required redress. They remained, even after the triumph, oppressed by the arms of the Government...

A letter of Señor Irigoyen was received in Montevideo, written from San Luis, and renitted from thence, which contains these very ideas...
